

TEXTTEASE:

Deconstructing Foreign Language Textbook Dialogs

Let's open our textbooks and practice

The Perfect Dialog:

a conversation between attractive,
middle-class, white
Euro-Americans who constantly discuss
"The Weather", "Travel", "Sports"
"Shopping", "Eating", and "Popular Movies"
. . . anything
simple
generic
and non-controversial

Don't tell me about the world's problems.

Don't mention how ecosystems are vanishing each day.

Don't point out my shortcomings.

Don't challenge my opinions in any way.

All I want to do

is have a nice, pleasant conversation
and move my mouth

without having to think

because when we look at the world and confront

death,

deception,

delusion,

disinformation,

& decay

. . . it isn't so easy to speak.

Melissa: Lots of teachers teach this way: they follow the book so closely that they fail to really teach.

Liao: Yeah, the real lesson is not in any book or external material: it's in the living interaction among sentient beings. Many aspects of that interaction can't be planned.

Tim: Educational planners find that discomfoting. Educational systems in general are orientated towards control and manipulation, and anything not fitting within the agenda is dismissed. As a result, we often get "McDonaldized" education: material that's bland, but acceptable to the ruling hegemony.

Satoru: I suppose this is inevitable. Maybe of the most important elements of education can never be calculated precisely. It's an organic experience, and never the same one twice.

- T Newfields [Nitta Hirou / Huáng Yuèwǔ]

Begun: 1996 in Shizuoka, Japan * Finished: 2018 in Yokohama, Japan

